13 Duxbury. She was employed as a schoolmistress in the local towns, where she was remembered 14 as a teacher who not only disapproved of corporal punishment but succeeded in controlling even 15 the unruliest students. She gave up teaching to care for her brother's children at the death of their 16 mother, later adopting her niece and nephew. Hatch also cared for an invalid mother at the family 17 home and served as postmistress in East Pembroke in the early 1870s. Lavina Hatch was an 18 advocate for women's rights during the late 19th century. She worked closely with Susan B. 19 Anthony, a prominent American women's rights activist, on a chapter for the fourth volume of 20 the History of Woman Suffrage. The two also collaborated on writing on the work of the 21 Massachusetts National Association.
