The bill expands the grant program administered by the Colorado bureau of investigation (CBI) that assists counties in implementing recovery programs for persons who wander (grant program). A recovery program for persons who wander (recovery program), currently known as a lifesaver program, is a program under which a participant has a device that may be used to assist in attempting to electronically locate the participant. The bill expands the grant program to apply to recovery programs established or maintained by counties and municipalities (local governments) or local government designees. The bill also removes limits on the amount local governments and their designees may be awarded in any single grant and on the amount of money that the general assembly may annually appropriate to the recovery program cash fund that funds the grant program. Further, the bill allows the executive director of the department of public safety to award grants to assist in maintaining and implementing recovery programs.

The bill also requires the CBI to establish a website that lists those local governments and local government designees that have a recovery program, describes how to contact those local governments and local government designees, lists resources for caretakers of persons with medical conditions that cause wandering, provides procedures to follow when a participant of a recovery program is determined to be missing, describes how the technology used by the various local governments and local government designees for recovery programs works, and provides any other information the CBI may conclude is necessary to better explain and publicize recovery programs.
