TONY LEWIS

Tony Lewis, Jr. is a community leader, youth advocate, and work force development professional specializing in justice-involved men and women. He currently serves as a vocational development specialist at Court Services and Offender Supervision Agency (CSOSA), leading programs to ensure men and women with a history of incarceration have complete and seamless reentry into society.

Mr. Lewis personally understands the impact of incarceration on communities – to both the person serving time and his or her family. At the age of 9, Mr. Lewis’s father, Tony Lewis, Sr., was arrested and sentenced to life in prison for his connection to the largest drug operation in the District. At the same time, his mother struggled with mental illness, which was exacerbated by his father’s incarceration. Growing up in this atmosphere, Mr. Lewis was exposed to a criminal enterprise that he could have easily emulated. He credits his mother for motivating him to pursue education.

Mr. Lewis’s work and advocacy has been featured on CNN, BET, and in the Washington Post. He is the winner of the Steve Harvey - Ford Motor Company “Best Community Leader Award” and the “Presidential Call to Service Award.” His memoir, Slugg: A Boys’ Life in the Age of Mass Incarceration is a soulful meditation on the social and political forces that profoundly changed the course of his life, the outlook of his generation, and the prospects of generations to follow.

A native Washingtonian and resident of Ward 2, Mr. Lewis graduated from Gonzaga High School, and earned a Bachelor of Arts from the University of the District of Columbia.
