Nicholas Caylor

Dr. Nicholas Caylor DPT, PT is the lead physical therapist at George Washington University Hospital (GWUH), and current member of the District of Columbia Board of Physical Therapy.

At GWUH, Dr. Caylor leads a team of 81 clinicians and support staff, while directly supervising 10 Senior Level therapists and specialists. In this role, he provides coaching, mentorship, and establishes expectations with senior and staff level therapists. Dr. Caylor also developed the COVID Functional Maintenance Program. This is a therapy driven program to evaluate and provide interventions to all medically stable individuals with SARS-CoV-2 infections. It has consistently helped to reduce the profound functional loss accompanying hospitalized patients with COVID.

Throughout his career, Dr. Caylor has been a passionate advocate for acute care physical therapy, specializing in critical care. He has second-authored and presented at physical therapy conferences, highlighting a method to simulate the acute care environment in a classroom environment. Dr. Caylor also represents his physical therapy department at several multidisciplinary council meetings, provides clinical instruction to Doctor of Physical Therapy GWUH students, and works with the departmental leadership to develop and implement new hospital initiatives.

A Ward 5 resident, Dr. Nicholas Caylor received a Bachelor of Science in General Studies from the University of Idaho and a Doctor of Physical Therapy from the MGH Institute of Health Professions.
