Whereas the United States International Trade Commission estimates that the United States–Colombia Trade Promotion Agreement, United States–Panama Free Trade Agreement, and United States–Korea Free Trade Agreement, once implemented, would increase annual United States exports of goods alone by roughly $12,000,000,000;

Whereas United States Trade Representative Ron Kirk said, the pending agreements with South Korea, Colombia, and Panama, in particular, “have value, and when we are fighting for every job on the table, we need to get these right so we can reap the benefit”;

Whereas United States Trade Representative Ron Kirk said, “I believe there is enough value in [the pacts with] Panama and Colombia, particularly since we have already granted duty-free status to goods” from both countries, “You just can't make a credible case to deny us the return investment”;

Whereas United States Commerce Secretary Gary Locke said, “This administration will pursue trade agreements that are balanced [and] ambitious and improve market access for U.S. workers, firms, farmers and ranchers”;

Whereas President Barack Obama said, “Those who once would oppose any trade agreement now understand that there are new markets and new sectors out there that we need to break into if we want our workers to get ahead”;
